Maddie Rose gritted out through clamped teeth while thrusting all of her weight into pushing the cattle trailers rear gate closed. A hard task since her hundred twenty pounds didnt hold up against Bufords two thousand pound bulk. Needless to say, despite all of her shoving and pushing. Despite all of her exertion. Bufords big, hairy rump hadnt budged even an inch! Nope, there it washanging out over the back end of the trailer. Firmly in the way of the latch. Cmon, only a few more inches, she coaxed, pushing, giving it everything she had. But the bull wasnt buying it. He didnt budge. Arrrg, she growled, frustration nearly getting the better of her. This should have been a piece of cakean easy load-up. Ha! Bull-headed Buford messed that up deciding he wanted off rather than on. Just Maddies luck. And what was new about that? Nothing, she grumbled. She wasnt a whiner, but there was no getting around the hard truth that most things in Maddies life hadnt come easy. Shed been fighting for survival since the moment of her existencea sickly baby only a few weeks old at best estimation, found alone, sitting in a carseat. Yupjust sitting on the steps of the post office like she belonged there. Obviously, she didnt belong anywhere. Maybe before that, but unlike most people Maddie had no recollection, no records, nothing...as far as her life record went she hadnt existed until that day in the post office when she was found. If shed been a whiner she wouldnt have made it. No, Maddie was a survivor so shed grown used to days like today. But it sure was getting old. Bufords attitude was a sharp reminder shed better not get comfortable with the good fortune that had recently come her way. Owner. The thought dazzled her. Like a beautiful sparkly gift under the Christmas tree that she knew had to belong to someone else...an
